This is one reason, I think, that many young Asian-Americans continue to assimilate quietly into America as doctors, scientists and engineers. Our struggles are individual and familial but ___ communal or political. Ours is a frustratingly limited version of the AMERICAN Dream. While I can strive for into Harvard and become the talk of the Korean mothers in my hometown, God forbid that I aim much further and higher than that -- fame and influence as a writer, an intellectual or perhaps president of the United States. I wish more than anything else to feel like part of something more than myself and my personal ambitions, part of a larger culture. Unfortunately, by coming to America my parents lost the cultural legacy they would have passed on to me. When I visited my hometown last summer, I found that I was chastised by many people for never learning how to speak Korean and for turning my back on their culture. Taxi drivers would refuse to stop for me and my Korean-American friends because they knew from our accents where we had come from. And, in spite of the 17 years I have spent in this country, I feel more acutely conscious than ever of the fact that I am not completely American. Recently, a black man called me a "little Chinese faggot" in a mens room, and a 15 woman on the street told me to "go back toJapan." Americans, I think, feel a(n) 16 to keep both Asians and Asian-Americans at asociological, philosophical and geographical distance. With 17_ numbers of Asian-American18 applying to top colleges, many white students have begun to complain about Asian-American 19 and competitiveness, calling us "Asian nerds." Many Americans consider thisas part of a larger "Asian invasionf associated 20 Japans export success in America. 01. [A] one [B] part [C] much [D] some 02. Text 1 InfraGard is a grass-roots effort to respond to the need for cooperation and collaboration in countering the threat of cybercrime and terrorism to private businesses and the government. By the end of September, there will be InfraGard chapters in all 50 states, Calloway said. With advice from the FBI, each local chapter will be run by a board of directors that includes members of private industry, the academic community and public agencies. Banks, utilities, and other businesses and government agencies will use a secure Web site to share information about attempts to hack into their computer networks. Members can join the system at no charge. A key feature of the system is a two-pronged method of reporting attacks. A "sanitized" description of a hacking attempt or other incident - one that doesn't reveal the name or
