The National Endowment for the Arts recently released the results of its "Reading at Risk" survey, which described the movement of the American public away from books and literature and toward television and electronic media. According to the survey, "reading is on the decline in 62 every region, within every ethnic group, and at every educational level." The day 63 the NEA report released, the U.S. House, in a tie vote, upheld the government's right to obtain bookstore and library records under a provision of the USA Patriot Act. The House proposal would have barred the federal government from demand 64 library records, reading lists, book customer lists and other material in terrorism and intelligence investigations. These two events are completely unrelated to 65, yet they echo each other in the message they send about the place of books and reading in American culture. At the heart of the NEA survey is the belief in 66.

our democratic system depends on leaders who can think critically, analyze texts and writing 67. clearly. All of these are skills promoted by reading and discussing books and literature. At the same time, through a provision of the Patriot Act, the leaders of our country are unconsciously sending the message that reading may be connected to desirable 68. activities that might undermine our system of government rather than helping democracy flourish. Our cultures decline in reading begin 69. well before the existence of the Patriot Act. During the 1980s culture wars, school systems across the country pulled some books from library shelves because its 70. content was deemed by parents and teachers to be inappropriate. Now what started in schools across the country is playing itself out on a nation 71. stage and is possibly having an impact on the reading habits of the American public. 100Test 下载频道开通，各类考试题目直接下载。详细请访问 www.100test.com
