I agree with this statement because the comparison between fiction and textbooks concerns what they can teach us about life, not about something academic and abstract. It is an obvious fact that fiction contains much more life than textbook. In a novel for instance, there are different characters portrayed in some definite settings of time and place. When we read the novel, we follow the characters into a fictitious world in which there is everything that people can find in the real world. The result is that we can experience all that the characters do and we enjoy the advantage of having an omniscient view, able to see many things that we cannot in the real world.来源：考试大 In contrast, most textbooks teach us knowledge in various special fields, knowledge that is abstract and academic. Some textbooks do teach us some truths about life, but they are only guidelines that we may not be able to appreciate. Like fiction, a few textbooks of language and literature can teach us something about life, but they contain only some chapters or excerpts and thus are short and incomplete. In short, textbooks teach us far less about life than fictitious works because of their limitations in both content and quantity. The other reason why fiction can teach us more about life is that we read much more fiction than textbooks. Because fictitious works are usually interesting, we read them whenever we have time to spare or get bored with our studies. and we often get so absorbed that we do not want to stop until the end. In contrast, textbooks are normally dull and we get tired of reading easily. As a result, we read much more of fiction and learn much more from it about life than from textbooks.
