People choose friends in different ways. Some people like to choose those who are different from themselves while others prefer those who are similar to themselves. Each of the two ways has its own advantages.

来源：考试大 When people have friends similar to themselves, they and their friends chat, play, and do things together naturally and harmoniously. The result is that they all can feel relaxed and can truly enjoy each other's company. For instance, if an active and energetic guy proposes to his equally active and energetic friends that they should have some activities, it is more likely that his will agree at once. In this case, the guy who makes the proposal does not have to consider carefully before he does it and his friends do not feel obliged to agree. Everybody is at ease and everybody can have a good time. When a guy has friends different from him, the advantage he has is that he can mix with different people and benefit from the contacts with them. His friends may be different from him in character, education, occupation, social status, or political and religious beliefs. To make friends with them, he has to chat, play, or do things together with them. In the process of doing these, he can learn a lot of things that he has never experienced himself and he can also enjoy being with them if he knows them well. However, each of the two ways of making friends has its disadvantages. When a guy mixes with only people similar to himself, his social circle is small and he may miss a lot without realizing it. On the other hand, if a person makes friends with people different from himself, he has to be on the alert all the time and he has to be skillful in dealing with all kinds of people.

In this way, I can have the best of both worlds. For instance, when I want to relax or when I am too tired to be careful about my speech and manner, I can stay with those friends who are like me. But, when I feel like it, it is also possible for me to stay with those who are different from me and learn something new.
