The benefits of nuclear technology far outweigh the disadvantages. Give reasons for your answer. People can no longer expect a job for life. What should individuals and governments do to prepare the current and future environments for different working conditions? As technological innovation brings about rapid changes and retraining becomes a lifelong necessity, industry should take over more and more of the responsibility for education. It is more important for governments to ensure adequate standards of housing, education and health care for their citizens by developing the industrial base than to use their resources to develop the rural areas. Business education and training today must promote environmental awareness. Whilst studying abroad provides an opportunity to broaden one's experience, it also presents the danger of negative influences from the host culture. Technological advances continue to improve manufacturing efficiency. The weight of a drink can has come down from thirty-five grams to about fifteen grams, for example, and modern cars and production techniques are much more energy efficient. Governments need to control the environment rather than controlling industry, as companies already control their resources very efficiently. Training for work is far more important than providing a broad-based education. What steps should a student take in preparing for tertiary education and what would be the benefit of taking such steps? The developed world should lead by example and not insist that aid to the Third World is used to
