The new American commander in Iraq, General David Petraeus, must report to Congress in mid-September on how his campaign is going. Advocates of quitting say that after losing more than 3,000 soldiers and spending more than $300 billion America has already failed and should therefore depart. So why, instead of waiting two months for the generals report, have politicians in Washington allowed the debate to take on such a frantic new character? 前置成分： WHEN a war such as the one in Iraq turns bad, there is not always a particular moment that defines the point of defeat. If anything, it has so far been a modest success. As John McCain told the Senate this week after a visit to Iraq, the new strategy has been an improvement on the one it replaced. By venturing out of their bases to offer direct protection to Iraq's population, American soldiers have been able to reduce the sectarian killings in the capital. In Diyala province American troops have moved on the city of Baquba. In a trial widely condemned abroad as unfair, the six have been convicted of deliberately infecting hundreds of Libyan children with HIV. 后置成分 Continuing to support this war has now become a near-suicidal strategy for any ambitious politician, as the principled Senator McCain has discovered to his cost.
