Arbitration is an arduous process that requires patience. Both parties in a dispute are typically ardent about their opinions. Its this state of ardor that makes it difficult to approach a satisfactory solution. Fortunately, I have the aptitude for understands peoples needs and finding an appropriate solution that satisfies the approximate requirements of both sides. The parties who approve me to judge their case know that Im apt to make a fair and reasonable decision, not an arbitray one. This knowledge tends to lower the apprehension of both parties. I find that if the parties are less apprehensive, they are more cooperative. But no case is easy. Theres always a sticking point. Presently, Im working on a dispute between an old farmer and the government. The old farmer owns a piece of arable land on which he has grown fruit trees for 25 years. He wants to keep his land just as it is, not only because of his trees , but also due to the arboreal life it supports. The government believes that the old mans farming methods are archaic and not a productive use of the land. They want approval to use farmers land to build a huge high-tech public aquarium. They want to display unique aquatic creatures to help educate the public. The government plans to make this project the archetype for all future public aquariums. Well, its going to be a tough case. In fact, it may be my toughest case yet. 100Test 下载频道开通 , 各类考试题目直接下载。详细请访问 www.100test.com
