China Adopt Favorable Policies to Attract Foreign-trained Students?

According to an online survey, by the end of 2006, over 1 million Chinese went abroad for higher education. Over 75 percent of them have chosen to stay abroad. In order to attract them back home after their studies to contribute to their motherland, China has offered them a range of favorable policies, including the hukou policy and giving priority to their family members in terms of employment and higher education enrollment. However, people in China are divided in their views on these policies. Many people support these policies while some have different opinions. Those who are for the policies think that real life consists of many practical issues and working conditions are very important for the future development of those students. We should not just rely on patriotism to get them back.

Those who are against these policies hold the view that these policies will reinforce peoples pessimism about the education and working conditions in China. They think that we should continue our development and let those students decide on their own. I am in favor of the former. The brain drain is a serious problem in China. We should try every means to reverse it. Attracting foreign-trained people with favorable policies is an important tool. Part Reading Comprehension (Skimming and Scanning) 1.
