The benchmark Shanghai Composite Index, which covers A and B shares, was up 11.80 points at 2,431.57. But demand for index heavyweights, especially financial stocks, waned mid-morning despite strong rises on opening, traders said. "The market is most likely in a slow 'up' trend, given the government's policy supports and ample liquidity in the market," Zhang Gang, an analyst at Central China Securities, told Dow Jones Newswires. The Shanghai A-share index added 12.37 points, or 0.49 percent, to 2,552.27, while the Shenzhen A-share index rose 3.76 points, or 0.45 percent, to 847.07. 100Test 下载频道开通，各类考试题目直接下载。详细请访问 www.100test.com
