: On Qualification-obtaining Fever Currently, there is a long-lasting fever of obtaining a variety of qualifications among college students, including vocational qualifications and skills certificates. Many students spend their weekends and vacation in preparing for tests on English, Law and Computer Science. Even after their graduation, some of them are still having full enthusiasm on it. No doubt qualifications have attractions of their own. They are evidences to confirm students' abilities. Work-related or competence-based qualifications may even help students find a satisfactory job, so students hold the opinion that they are obtaining not credentials but opportunities for their future. However, as it is known to all that each coin has its two sides, obtaining qualifications also brings negative influences in spite of its advantages. First, some vocational qualifications are obtained at the expense of the basic discipline study or major learning. Second, it will take 300 to 500 Yuan to go in for a certain certificate, leading to great financial burden. Third, better jobs do not always necessarily follow more qualifications. From my point of view, what matters most is relevant experience or skill, not the number of credentials you have obtained.
