But even if so, I still maintain that letter writing will never be killed by phones, though we have stepped into the Information Age. First, letters can express your subtle feelings. With the increase of the living pace of modern society, we find that there is a lack of communication now. Sometimes when you are speaking to someone that you care and love on the phone, you are so shy that it ' s too hard to express any of your feelings towards him/her. Your throat seems to be blocked! At this time, letters will help. Without any embarrassment, you can just write down your deep concern and love on a piece of paper. When you drop the letter into the pillar-box, you will feel what he/she will receive is not only a letter, but also your deepest love. Secondly, letters can be kept as a record of memory, while phones cannot. Just imagine, when you open an old box of letters and read them years later, a lot of beautiful and indelible memories will be brought back to you. What an irreplaceable feeling it is! And I believe, this feeling is something that you can definitely never experience through several phone calls. All in all, letter writing will absolutely survive and even thrive in the Information Age. Phones can never kill it, neither will anything. SECTION B NOTE WRITING May 9th, 2004 Dear Jane, I ' m sorry to hear that you didn't do very well in the final exam and I know you must be very unhappy about it. But please don't lose heart, since you have done your best. I think what you need is to sum up your mistakes and make good preparation for next time. I believe you'll succeed.

Good luck! Yours sincerely, Candy
