The year 1949 witnessed the veritable inception of womens liberation in China. Back then, ensuring equal rights for both men and women was made a national policy, enabling women to engage themselves in working and production. It was a remarkable move in that it has granted Chinese women, at one single stroke the rights to work and vote which took their western counterparts over a century to come by. As a result, the proportion of working women in China had surpassed that in many western countries, with almost all the able and working-age women stepping out of the kitchen and into the workplace, representing a critical step forward, so to speak. However, that age was punctuated with extremes in seeing things. An overemphasis on gender equality had obscured the distinction between men and women by arguing that what can be done by men can well be done by women. Both genders dressed in the same way and girls didn't wear make-ups any more. The line between the two sexes had seemingly dissolved. This, however, was attributable to the fact that women, who enjoyed very low status down in the pecking order in the past, finally saw their pent-up possibilities in various fields being given a free rein. As a result, they found themselves on a much higher rung up the social ladder, but at the cost of their uniqueness from men. 相关推荐
