问及你的隐私，你该如何回答呢？下面让我们一起来借鉴下吧。 Prepping for job interviews is the subject of plenty of coaching and advice. But when job interviews turn to juggle-related topics, some questions can catch interviewees completely unprepared. Some women readers say they have been asked,

’ What are your child-care arrangements? ’ or ’ Do you plan to have a family any time soon? ’ Author Bob Rosner identifies other

’ toxic questions ’ in his book, ’ The Boss ’ s Survival Guide ’ :

’ I love your accent. where are you from? ’ (This one suggests ethnic or racial discrimination.) ’ When did you graduate from high school? ’ (This one smacks of age discrimination.) ’ Are you currently using birth control? ’ (Again, implies pregnancy discrimination.) To avoid appearing to discriminate based on sex, bosses should stick strictly to job-related queries. Employers with 15 or more employees are covered by federal anti-discrimination law, which makes sex and pregnancy discrimination illegal. a few states, including New York, New Jersey and California, have anti-bias laws covering smaller employers. Some managers try to startle interviewees into candid revelations about their personal values or philosophy. Ad executive Michael Mathieu told the New York Times that he likes to ask candidates, ’ What is the meaning of life?

’ He said, ’ It ’ s a fun question because no one ’ s expecting it. ’

One of his favorite answers, he added, was, ' Are you talking about my business life or my personal life? ' Rather than probing too much, one of my bosses on a previous job many years ago took the opposite tack: He simply stopped talking and stared at the applicant for a minute or more of stony silence. The strategy: To size up candidates ' poise. Would they jabber senselessly to fill up the silence, pose an intelligent question, or squirm in anxiety?

Meanwhile, nannies seem to be the target of oddball queries from potential employers, as I ' ve reported previously. Some parents ask nanny candidates, ' How often do you bathe? ' or, ' Do you have a boyfriend? ' Others say they have been asked if they have sexually transmitted diseases. Readers, have you been asked surprising or disarming questions in job interviews? Or inappropriate ones? If you have been on the hiring end, what are your favorite questions? What do you think is the right boundary against probing too much on personal issues? 相关推荐：#0000ff>面试的真正目的是什么？#0000ff>职场英语：最不该和老板说的十句话#0000ff>1965年李小龙面试福克斯 超牛英语诠释功夫魅力#0000ff>面试英语口语经典问答#0000ff>毁掉你面试的元凶：20个细节暴露你的弱点 100Test 下载频道开通，各类考试题目直接下载。详细请访问 www.100test.com
